

Refugees in the City, Cooking with Refugees in Berlin

Basic needs take on a substantially different importance when confronted with extreme situations. In the case of refugees, along with coping with a new social context, regularizing a legal status, finding a job, etc., feeding your family is a pressing need, every day. But cooking and sharing a meal is at the same a moment for building ties within the family and the community, for cultivating the customs of the land left behind, for restoring body and soul.

“Refugees in the City: community kitchens in Berlin” will explore the world of the refugees and asylum seekers in Berlin taking the cultural, social and practical dimensions of shared cooking as a starting point from which to develop architectural and urban design solutions on variety of scales: Proposals may range from kitchen furniture, communal spaces, the organization of refugee housing and refugee-driven urban economies. The work will be based on direct experience with refugee communities and the documentation of their needs.
